“Education is a journey, not a destination” – Ralph Waldo Emerson

I am deeply committed to the transformative power of education. My teaching approach is driven by the principle that learning is most effective when students and instructors collaborate in an environment that fosters active engagement, critical thinking, and practical application.

Throughout my academic journey, I have had the privilege of teaching a diverse range of courses, from mathematics and statistics to finance and economics, spanning various educational levels. My teaching experience has reinforced my conviction that the key to effective instruction lies in enabling students to comprehend the "why" behind concepts and equipping them with the tools and skills necessary for success. Central to my teaching philosophy is the belief that students learn best when they are actively engaged in the learning process. To achieve this, I create a classroom atmosphere that encourages open dialogue, where questions are welcomed, and where students feel empowered to explore and challenge concepts collaboratively.

My approach to teaching goes beyond traditional methods. I firmly believe that by introducing exciting challenges that resemble puzzles and by providing students with the necessary resources for success, we can make learning an enjoyable and enriching experience. This method has been validated by the enthusiastic feedback of my students, leading to my recognition as the instructor with the highest student appraisal in the University of the West Indies' Faculty of Social Sciences, Department of Economics.

I am committed to continuous improvement as an instructor, actively seeking innovative teaching practices and staying attuned to evolving educational technologies. In my classrooms, diversity and inclusivity are not just ideals but essential components of the learning process. I strive to create an environment where every student, regardless of their background or learning style, can thrive.

In conclusion, my teaching philosophy is driven by the belief that education is the cornerstone of personal and societal growth. My commitment to engaging students, fostering critical thinking, and providing practical skills is unwavering. I look forward to the opportunity to contribute to the intellectual and personal development of future generations through my passion for teaching.
